2022 World Affairs Seminar Program Highlights

The COVID-19 pandemic has led to newfound attention on matters related to global health and wellness. This contagious virus had a profound impact on the lives of people around the world, while simultaneously upending existing social, political, and economic systems within – and among – such nations. Media outlets struggled to make sense of the event, as disinformation and outright conspiracy theories provided comfort for many in the face of the unthinkable. Health care systems in numerous countries were stretched to their breaking point, as medical officials battled heroically to contain a threat that cared little about individual identity or international borders. Political leaders struggled to maintain order as the pandemic ushered in a vast financial crisis. It was a moment that we will never forget.

Yet if the pandemic was a moment of crisis, it was also a moment of opportunity. The 2022 World Affairs Seminar, “Reimagining Global Health and Wellness: Contagious Ideas,” suggests that the pandemic highlighted the need for new ideas in light of the systemic breakdowns that marked the worldwide spread of COVID-19. The pandemic offered a moment to think anew about both individual and collective health and wellness, of how we respond to things like viruses and their impact on global society. Such a re-imagining of global health and wellness obviously has implications for the ways we approach medical treatment. But, in addition to its impact on the practice of health care, this act of reimagination may also lead to a rethinking of how we learn about, and communicate, such urgent health-related matters. It may even lead to new ideas on both economics and politics.

The COVID-19 pandemic proved the power of a contagion. It is now time for the spread of a some more positive: “Contagious Ideas” that showcase humanity’s resiliency and ability to learn from the past.
